Danville, VA -
If you live in Danville, you can now get internet access for free in area parks. It's part of the city's "hot parks" project, and it's almost complete. Parks and Recreation officials say they, along with other city departments, started the project about a year ago to help improve quality of life.

You can get free WiFi in many of the city's public spaces, including Ballou Park, Dan Daniel Memorial Park, and Angler's Park. Officials say the costs were mostly covered through grants.

They say it's good for the community and will allow residents to use the parks in different ways. Bill Sgrinia with Danville Parks and Recreation said, "I know in other cities there are other wireless hotspots but generally they're not provided by the municipality as far as I know we are the only parks system that I have heard of that has wireless access."

Officials say they'll also provide free WiFi in community buildings, like the community market and welcome center.
